> THE POPULATION OF CHINA A correspondent of the N. C. Daily News

writing from Western Shantang discusses this question, and gives some interesting facts concorning it from Shanting :--The question of the population of China is an antique, which assemt to have been viewed from China, 1st July, 1890, 10,006 almost every paint of vision, with results extremely inharmonious. The reasons for this are sufficiently well known, and have often been explained at length in these columns. It appears to be well settled that no real dependence can be R'kong, 22nd Fab., 1891, 14,000 placed upon the Chinesa official returns, yet that they are the only basis upon which rational estimates can be based, and therefore have a certain value. So far as we are aware, all fforts to come at the real population per square mile have proceeded from such extensive units as provinces, or at least prefectures, the foundstion and superstructure being alike a mere pagoda of guesses. Some years ago an effort was made in this district to make a more exact computation of the population of a very limited area, as a sort of unit of measure. For this purpose a circle was taken, the radius of which was twenty li. the foreign residence being at the centre. A list was made of every village having received famine relief in the year 1878. so that it was not difficult to make a proximate guess at the average number of families. The hins, 18th April, 1891 10,000 villages were 150 in number, and the average size was taken as 80 families, which, allowing five persons to the family. gave a 26.000 total of 60,000 persons. Allowing six miles 5.000 to be the equivalent of twenty li, the popu-7,000 lation of the square mile is 551, or considerably above the average of the kingdom of Belgium (the most dousely populated country in Europe), which had in 1873 an average of 7.500 only 462 to the square mile. At a distance of a few miles beyond this circle, there is a tract callad the "Thirteen Villages," because there are that number within a distance of five li! This s lows that the particular region in which this estimate was made happens to be an unfavourable one for the purpose, as a considerable part 6,000 of it is waste, owing to an old bed of the Yellow River which has devastated a broad band of land. on which are no villages. There is also a canal leading from the Grand Canal to the sea, and a long depression much below the general average, thinly occupied by villages, because it is liable to inundation as in 1890. For these reasons it seemed desirable to make a new count in a better spot, and for this purpose a district was chosen, situated about ninety liesst of the sub-prefecture of Linching, to which it belongs. The area taken was only balf the size of the former, and instead of merely estimating the average population of the villages, the actual number of families in each was taken, so far as this number is known to the natives. The man who prepared the the village map of the area is a native of the central village, and a person of excellent sense. He put the population in every case somewhat below the popular estimate so 1,500 as to be certainly within bounds. The number 6, 00 of persons to a "family" was still taken at five, though, as he pointed out, this is a totally indequate allowance. Many "families" live and 6.250 have all things in common, and are therefore counted as one, although as in the case of this particular individual, the "family" may conaist of some twenty persons. To the travel. ler in this region, the villages appear to be both large and thickly clustered. and the enumeration shows this to be the case. Within a radius of tan li (three miles) there are sixty-four villages, the smallest having thirty families and the largest more than a thousand, while the average is 188 families. The total number of persons at five to the family is 60,200. or more than double the estimate for the region 7,400 with twice the diameter. This gives a population of 2,129 to the square mile. So far as appearances go, there are thousands of square miles in southern and central Chihli, western and south-6,100 western Shantung, and northern Honan, where the villages are as thick as in this one tract, the contents of which we are thus able proximately to compute. But for the plain of North China 6.000 as a whole, it is probable that it would be found more reasonable to estimate 300 persons to the square mile for the more sparsely settled districts, and from a thousand to fifteen hundred for the more thickly settled regions. In any case a vivid mpression is thus gained of the enormous number of human beings crowded into these fortile and historic plains, and also of the almost insuperable difficulties in the way of an exact knowledge of the facts of the true "census." In the tables published in Williams' Middle King. dom (vol. 1, p. 264), the population of Shantung fer 1812 is given as 28,958,764 and that for 1882 from the Almanac de Gotha based upon 3,250 the Chinese Customs returns, as 29,000,000, or almost the same. The former is reckoned on the basis of 65,000 square miles and the 40,000 average is found to be 444 persons to the 100 square mile. A large part of Shantung is mountainous and much of this is wholly waste territory, but some of the mountain districts have a numerous population tucked away in the valleys. and wherever there is a spot of arable soil sufficient to afford nutriment. The natives of such districts can with difficulty be persuaded toleave them and go elsewhere. One old man who had done so explained that when he was down on the plain he felt "all-out-doors" (k'uan te huanah and had to come back delication

On examination, the bundle was found opinion is divided. The event created great excitement. Thousands of people went to see the place where the tragic scene occurred. A great deal is said about it, but it is hard to get reliable information with regard to many points. The district magistrate held an inquest. If he found auvilium that demanded official interference and showed any disposition to punish the guilty, he is greatly misunderstood. The impression prevails that his course was to allow the wealthy murderers to satisfy the relatives of the victim by providing an expensive funeral and making a present of money. According to accounts an aunt of the deceased caused at one time a deadlook in the funeral proceedings by getting into the open coffin and declaring her purpose to stay there until her demands were complied with.
